Kimono no (For Women Only) ~ Day 1 I do not believe I've ever been a man who has been enamored by kimono. In fact, I've never had a real sense of what it is to be an adult man and I would think of kimono as a garment for children or women. But now, I'm fascinated and have found myself intrigued by it. This fall, I've decided to try my hand at making a kimono for myself. And, because I am not one to shy away from something that might cause me some hassle, I decided to take the plunge. I was recently asked by friends what kind of kimono I'd like. I of course answered that I would want a large, traditional-style kimono. I thought I'd be comfortable in a kimono that could double as a robe, but I quickly discovered that the larger the size, the harder it is to move about and the more awkward it would be to stand in. Also, I have very tiny wrists, so the idea of tying a kimono around the back was not possible for me. I also prefer not to wear a kimono with a jacket, as it becomes difficult to move about and put on the jacket. My friend suggested a more traditional kimono with a pattern that resembles the all-over designs of the Imperial Japanese Court ladies. I immediately became very curious. When I began searching for ideas for making my own kimono, I was surprised at how many patterns were out there, both of women's and men's kimono and what I was finding on blogs. The best way I could figure to go about it was to use a pattern that gave me the "feel" of the Imperial Japanese-style kimono. I did a little research and decided to use the Edo-style kimono pattern from the Fashion Institute of Design and Merchandising. While there
