The Adobe app on the sly is more powerful than the Photoshop app on the iPad, too. On iPad 2s, Lightroom 5/5 is faster while on iPad Pros, it's similar in speed. That's because the app on the App Store didn't feature the enterprise features of the version on Adobe's website. Later this year, an update to the iPad versions of Photoshop, Premiere, Lightroom and other apps should feature most of the enterprise features of the desktop versions. It was good enough for me, at least. It took Lightroom a while to upgrade to 5.0. I settled in at 5.0.1 and haven't looked back yet. If you're looking for a Photoshop alternative for your iPad Pro or iPad Air, I can help. Although Lightroom 5.0 is based on the same libraries that model over 500 million images and 140,000+ site templates, I didn't find Lightroom's editing software to be as powerful as Photoshop. It's the same thing with the expressions. It's not that they're not powerful, I just wouldn't use the expressions that I use with Photoshop because they're so different. Also, the tablet experience is more like using a physical copier in that, with the pen, you can quickly mark up an image or copy your work product after doing edits. The real downfall is that Photoshop lets you copy something to the clipboard, and then paste on other files and portfolios while you work, and Pro Photo Suite doesn't have that kind of capability. And if you copy an image using the toolbar (Jacket or Object) you have the ability to paste it on a new layer. I'm certain that Adobe will have to overcome this problem in future releases to become the iPad-of-Photoshop.

While this panel may not be the most exciting tool to many users, it allows you to control many aspects of the output of the image, such as how the edges of your photos will look when they're printed.
