The two ideas I'm talking about are 1 – a unified, Photoshop-centric approach to the image-based workflows and creative tools we all use to express ourselves through our work, and 2 – an interconnected ecosystem of best-of-breed applications and deployed services, also optimized through the latest technologies and engineering best practices. As a leading force in the digital image industry, Adobe is uniquely placed to take advantage of the synergistic benefits these two ideas offer. For me, it was obvious that this unified, Photoshop-centric approach will allow us to offer the best possible imaging solution for photographers and photo editors. The next chapter of the way digital images are created and made to work is upon us. The first step towards this future is to provide the best native hardware optimization for the GPUs of all the applications we use, with integrated performance monitoring and real-time application tuning to make the most of the latest GPUs and network infrastructure. This architectural foundation allows the application to be more dynamic in how it interprets the intent of each pixel while maintaining its native, accelerated GPU workload-specific performance. This enables existing applications to work seamlessly alongside brand new tools, apps, and services on the same workflow. Having the ability to leverage our full line of imaging and creative technologies on a unified browser-based publishing pipeline offers tremendous benefits for professional photographers, to say nothing of the business opportunities that this new opportunity creates for those of us in the business of helping people communicate.
